Investment Perspectives

Market

Strong company earnings, especially by those in tech and its related sectors, sparked enthusiasm for equities. Software and semiconductor companies continued to experience strong demand. In Consumer Discretionary, returns were led by the automotive industry as Tesla jumped on news that rental car companies would expand their fleets of electric vehicles. In Communications Services, investors struggled to make sense of yet another Facebook controversy, this time instigated by a whistleblower report, as well as the company's ambitious plan to invest in the metaverse—leading to it renaming itself Meta Platforms. All major markets gained except Japan, where optimism over new Prime Minister Fumio Kishida quickly faded after he suggested a possible increase in capital gains taxes.

Portfolio

Supply chain bottlenecks and related rising costs have dominated recent news headlines. Many of our holdings have been able to pass on price increases to customers, thanks in large part to their strong competitive positions. While this insulates them from inflation to some extent, they are not immune. In the case of Nike, factory closures and lengthy transit times have increased costs and reduced inventory; the company has indicated that supply chain challenges may continue through mid-2022. However, Nike has more than offset these headwinds by increasing prices and by accelerating its shift to focus its distribution more on direct-to-consumer channels, driving sales growth in both its own stores and online.
