

The 184-year-old French electrical equipment manufacturer Schneider Electric is almost a completely different company than it was 20 years ago, having acquired and built a portfolio of globally competitive businesses centered around easy-to-connect energy management and industrial control devices and integrated software. Diversifying its customer base away from heavy manufacturing and utilities, it now provides digital solutions for efficiency and sustainability to end uses spanning factory floors, commercial and residential buildings, data centers, and EV charging stations. A fall in capital spending since the start of the pandemic has unsurprisingly lowered Schneider's full-year earnings expectations. Longer-term uncertainty around commercial real estate has also emerged as a potential headwind for its sizeable smart office business. However, Schneider is a far more resilient business than it was at this last turn of the century, well prepared to meet customers' needs to monitor facilities remotely and build energy efficient cloud computing. If most high-quality industrial companies are sometimes colloquially referred to as "GDP-plus" companies, able to grow slightly faster than their economies as a whole, today's Schneider, with a steady high rate of cash flow return on investment, would appear to be a GDP-plus-plus.

BENCHMARK PERFORMANCE BY SECTOR – OCTOBER

- Energy and Health Care were the month's weakest sectors. Oil prices continued to soften as another wave of COVID-19 infections rose in Europe and the US. Pharmaceutical companies were hurt by expectations of a US political shift towards Democrats, who historically have favored greater drug price regulation.
- Communication Services led the way on the upside, again paced by COVID-19 winners e-commerce and social media companies.

BENCHMARK PERFORMANCE BY GEOGRAPHY – OCTOBER

- Plans for new lockdowns in Germany, France, Italy, and elsewhere weighed on the economic outlook and stock markets across Europe.
- Emerging Markets were the bright spot in October, with Asian markets lifted by momentum of the many e-commerce and social media companies in the region.

PERFORMANCE ATTRIBUTION BY SECTOR – OCTOBER

- Financials was our best-performing sector, driven mostly by US banks First Republic Bank and SVB Financial Group, both of which reported robust loan and deposit growth along with stable credit costs.
- Fragrances and flavors maker Symrise contributed to underperformance in the Materials sector as it experienced slower organic sales growth in its beverage and sweets segments.

PERFORMANCE ATTRIBUTION BY GEOGRAPHY – OCTOBER

- Tencent helped lead our Emerging Markets holdings higher. The Information Technology services company rose on optimism about its payment business as the valuation of its rival Ant Financial soared before its IPO was scuttled by regulators just after the month's end.
- Vertex Pharmaceuticals hurt our holdings in the US. The company ended development of a formerly promising treatment for a rare liver disease following poor results in Phase II trials.
